THROUGH THE CAMPS.

A Boy's Novel Adventures Among the Soldiers.

GRANT UNDER FIRE. His Fearlessness at Port Gibson and Raymond.

BY COL. FRED. D. GRANT, NEW YORK CITY. [COPYRIGHT 1887.]

The following morning my father and party went on board a captured rebel gunboat, which was called the General Price. As many troops as possible were put on board the gunboats and transports, and all steamed down to where the town of Bruinsburg had been. Not a house was left standing at this place; at least I cannot now remember to have seen one. All had been year-old lad in America. burned to the ground-dreadful consequence of war! The troops on board were landed

I remember that Gen. Grant seemed much gratified at the way in which Admiral Porter co-operated with him in making use of my father's Orderlies. He immediately disthe men-of-war for conveying both infantry | mounted, came and sat down beside me. I and artillery across the river. During that afternoon troops were marched over and placed near the hills back of Bruinsburg, the blanket out and, giving me his saddle for and the boats continued to bring more of a pillow, said kindly, " Now try to get some them over far into the night, if not until sleep," I gratefully lay down, and was soon daylight. As there was no great attention paid to me, I laid myself upon the deck of the Price and fell into a sound slumber. When I awakened in the morning I discovered that

MY PATHER WAS GONE.

I could hear the firing of guns, and knew that a battle was in progress. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, the Adjutant-General of the army, was still on board the Price, and as he seemed to be in charge of all at the landing, I asked him where my father had gone, with the determination to follow him. Gen. Thomas seemed to be very anxious, and said that there was a great battle going on; that my father had left very early in the morning, and had asked him to look out for me, and not allow me, upon any condition, to go on

Upon our return to Bruinsburg, however, where some troops were landed, a rabbit appeared, jumping up in the field, and part of a regiment that had just arrived became interested in the pursuit of it. I asked Gen. Thomas to allow me to assist in catching this rabbit. He consented to my doing so. When I reached the soldiers down toward the battlefield. I joined them, the place for that night. We found in the and had walked several miles, when they vacant house a table all arranged for dinnerwere halted. As I felt wearied, and a small a choice dinner, too-which the family owntrain of ammunition wagons at this point ing the place had probably left suddenly, was about to start to the front, I made the owing to the awful battle which had raged acquaintance of one of the drivers, who let so near about them. All of our party sat me ride one of his mules. After some time down comfortably to enjoy a repast which we reached ground that gave evidence of proved to be having been fought upon. There were some of clothing, etc., strewn about upon the road paign. Now, however, I may recall the real with me. I followed the battery, which me where I was. went rapidly up to the left-hand road, and placed upon a hill, at the side of the road, ning in, having evidently broken loose from close. with their guns. Not being particularly with his chain daugling after him, searching pleased with the position I had gotten into, everywhere for his master. In my inexpe-I went back to the road and finding some troops just passing, I joined them. They were soon deployed to the left of the road My recallection is that these men belonged to the 7th Mo. They moved forward in line of battle and were soon hotly engaged in contest.

THE BABBIT HAD DISAPPEARED from view, but fearing that Gen. Thomas would not allow me to come ashore again, I did not return to the boat, but immedigoing on at the front.

While they were here Gen. Grant came along the line, and fearing that he would be displeased to find me here, instead of being on the boat where he had left me, I placed myself until he should leave for some other part of the field. He stopped near by, and calling an officer to him, he held some conversation with him and then passed along to the right. Very soon a great shout was heard, and the whole line moved forward. The enemy had given way. I followed with the troops until we reached the road again. The bat- rience I feared to arouse his anger by getting we had carried the day.

BEHIND A TREE

I had been with moved a short distance seemed possessed with the idea of investi- Hankinson's Ferry. Gen. Logan down the road toward Port Gibson, and gating me thoroughly and my surroundings. there went into bivouac about nightfall, Fortunately he proved not savage, and, with and I started off, hoping to find my father, the exception of keeping me awake and unhaving by this time become very tired and comfortable all night, did no harm. hungry. Wherever I went I found dead and wounded men. I was filled with horror as I wandered about over the field.

SO FRIGHTFUL TO ME lowed them a distance of about a quarter of I made use of a mile, to a small log house which had been taken and arranged for a hospital. Here the Surgeons were occupied in amputating limbs and binding up wounds, and all shout the house were poor fellows lying, many of them shricking with pain from their injuries, and many terrible moans and sights had I to confront now, so that I was really overcome and felt faint and ill. I tottered to the edge of the space occupied by the wounded, and sat, propping myself against a tree, probably the most wobegone twelve- ping at the house of a Hebrew friend, who him, we were all scated on the porch of a soldier on horseback approaching. He and the boats sent back to bring more of stopped in front of me and said, with great surprise,

FRED. GRANT AND THE ORDERLY.

"Why, hello! is that really you?" I saw with great relief that he was one of confided to him that I was tired out and felt ill. He then unsaddled his horse, spreading soundly slumbering, dreaming, however, much of the horrors of war and all that I had seen that day. Later in the night I was awakened by my good friend, the Orderly, who exclaimed:

"Look here; your father has come." I raised myself up and saw, about 50 yards off in the distance, a group of officers, and among them my father. I started with great joy to him, and I still have in my mind a vivid picture of him as he was then, sitting upon a little camp-stool, drinking from a

HAD JUST MADE FOR HIM. As I neared him he looked at me with great surprise, and said : "Why, Fred, I thought I left you safe on huge tin cup some coffee which the soldiers the boat at the landing!" To this I answered, "Yes, sir; you did." "Then how did you manage to get here?" I explained all, saying I had walked part of the way. He smiled and replied: "Very well; you cannot get back now, I suppose," and then he continued conversation with officers about him.

My father used to tell the story of my meeting him at the battle of Port Gibson. long afterward, with interest, and much

After the coffee had been disposed of, some one came up and said to Gen. Grant that I soon found a party of men marching started with his staff and took possession of they halted and went into bivouac.

THE ONLY GOOD ONE

wounded men, abandoned canteens, pieces that my father partock of during that cammisery I endured during that night; for be-We soon came to a fork in the road. At ing an exhausted, sleepy boy, I took my dawn, when, becoming very cold, I got up my head that possibly so many men might this point a battery of artillery dashed up, place on the floor to rest before the officers and went indoors. There I found a bed with and I left my friendly teamster, who had retired. My father, seeing me peacefully two occupants, and I took the liberty of been really kind, having divided his dinner sleeping, and not wishing to disturb me, left finding a place of rest between them. The facing the enemy, and opened vigorously his kennel, or house, and he went around me

the was finished, and I was informed that up to drive him out, and spent a great part | We could see what appeared to be a large

The following morning there seemed to be a great question over transportation, as Grand Gulf. there were really not enough horses to ac-I came upon burial parties who were col- commodate all at headquarters. A soldier lecting the dead and the suffering ones. solved the problem for some of us; he brought They would take up a body, carry it back a in two white horses, very large ones, which that I started off and joined another party and saddle. Such was not the case with me. who were collecting the wounded, and fol- and I was compelled to improvise a harness. a package of letters, among which, I have lady's saddle, without stirrups, completed my outfit. My horse proved to be so slow rather small boy upon an old white horse, when he which was at least 17 hands high, equipped as this one was, I must have been a comical from one of the navel officers (his own havspectacle, and the soldiers cheered me heart- ing been left and forgotten in his anxiety ily as I went riding by them. But many a upon graver subjects), then ordering his mount became as grotesque as mine was horse he started for McPherson's command. then before that campaign was ended.

AN OLD ROPE CLOTHES-LINE

previous night to Port Gibson was only ports reached us, bringing our baggage and about two miles, but it took me at least | horses on board of it. for materials to construct the bridge.

father and party returned to the town, stop- distance, and when Gen. Sherman joined invited us to dine with him. While here very large, comfortable house. My father I had not been here long before I saw a my father received the news of Grierson's greeted him pleasantly, but Gen. Sherman very successful raid. During this dinner seemed agitated; I think because of the several general officers of our army came in; wagons on the road, which interfered with among them was Gen. Logan. Gen. Grant, the progress of his troops. Gens. Grant and accomplish. He turned to me and said:

FRED. HIDES FROM HIS FATHER. heard of Grierson's success, turned to Logan fare.

COMPLIMENTED HIM CORDIALLY

prettiest fight you will ever see."

after the skirmish at the suspension bridge, the North Fork, where the troops were conwelcomed me kindly and loaned me

PART OF HIS OVERCOAT When all had left the room shortly after, I my bedfellows were two large negroes. I my resting-place and found my father at the which was a horse belonging to Gen. A. J. Smith. All of my father's horses had been left on the west bank of the Mississippi River. We soon mounted our horses, I

After riding a few miles my father and came to where the road forked, and found lery and infantry in line of battle. Gen. Grant sent a messenger back to the troops to hasten them forward, and a skirmish-line was formed by the men he had with him.

SOON REACHED THE FRONT. with two regiments of his division. These and one of the enemy's men. This ghastly panying my father, took one of these horses, board the Benton, several others following yet been removed.

with him. He at this time gave my father since learned, was one from Gen. Banks, saying that he could not be at Port Hudson as for my bridle, and the tree of an old side or | soon as he was expected there, and that he would have with him fewer men than Gen. Grant had counted upon his having. This, in movement that I was unable to keep up I presume, necessitated a change of orders; with Gen. Grant and his staff, so I fell far at any rate Gen. Grant began immediately to write letters and orders to his different The soldiers seemed to be intensely Generals. He continued steadily upon this amused at seeing me. As I passed along, a work until about 2 o'clock in the morning.

BORROWED A CHANGE OF LINEN I was left by my father with Col. Lagow, of The distance from our resting-place of the | the staff, and the next day one of the trans-

three-quarters of an hour to make the trip. The following afternoon Col. Lagow start-I found Gen. Grant upon the bank of Bayou | ed with wagons of our headquarters to join Pierre, where a pioneer company of sappers | the army, taking me with him. We reached and miners were building a bridge under my father at a little town called Rocky the direction of one of his staff officers, Col. Springs, where he had taken possession of J. H. Wilson. They were using boards an old Masonic Lodge for his headquarters. which they stripped from a house near by The next day Gen. Sherman came up with the Fifteenth Corps. By the time of

After remaining here for some time my his arrival Gen. Grant had gone on some talking for some time. When they had finished their conversation, Gen. Sherman seemed relieved and more cheerful. He soon departed.

From the 7th until the 12th of May my father spent his time, it seemed to me, riding in every direction, staying a short time with each of his three corps commanders, Sherman, McClernand and McPherson. All the time was passed in following my father about, by us at headquarters, and his "mess" began to be so neglected that I decided to take my meals with the soldiers, who did a little foraging on the road and lived much better than the commanding General. My father's table at this time was, I may frankly

THE WORST I EVER SAW or partock of. Even in times of peace he cast little thought upon his appetite and

On the 12th day of May, as we approached Fourteen Mile Creek, the enemy opened fire upon the splendid action of his division dur- upon us. Osterhaus, who commanded the ing the day previous, and told him that he advance division upon the road on which wished him to go to the old railroad suspen- we were moving, was ordered to throw sion bridge below Port Gibson to secure the a regiment out as skirmishers to the left, and send some cavalry on the road and on Gen. Logan was apparently pleased at this to the right. After a skirmish which conopportunity of having additional work to | tinued probably an hour the enemy left our front, but we could hear the roar of artillery "Come, my boy, and I will show you the away off to our right, so we knew a battle was going on somewhere in that direction. I went with Gen. Logan, who was very I had become very friendly with one of enthusiastic, and he fulfilled his promise to the Orderlies near me, called "Pony," After have a fight so far as possible for him do so | the enemy had departed from our immediate greater satisfaction than he expressed to me with an enemy that ran away after a few front Pony and I crossed the creek and shots were fired. I returned to Port Gibson | rode out a distance of probably a mile. We saw some of the rebels, with one cannon. and found my father gone, the bridge at the We, fearing that they would take us prisonately started for the hills to see what was there was an abandoned house less than a Bayon Pierre finished and our army cross- ers, started on a road to the right and in the half mile up the road, and he immediately ing. I followed the troops until dark, when direction of the cannonading, that we could

I rode on until I reached the crossing of Going up this road for possibly half a mile, we saw 10 or 12 horses tied to a fence structing another bridge. I stopped at a in front of a house near by. Pony immehouse near by, which had a porch in front, diately proposed that he and I should make covered over with sleeping officers. I crawled an independent charge upon them and capin between two of them, both of whom awoke | ture the horses while their riders were inand in energetic language remonstrated with | doors, and if possible try to surprise the men me. I told them who I was, when one of themselves into a surrender to us. This was them, Col. (afterward General) J. B. Sanborn, a bold move, but we made ready and started off at full speed. I was armed with a small pistol and Pony with the equipment of a for a pillow. I remained there until nearly cavalry soldier. The idea suddenly entered

MAKE PRISONERS OF US. I conveyed my thoughts to Pony. "Yes we are in a scrape, but it is too late to turn next morning when I awoke I found that back now," he said. We went on with apparent courage but much trepidation in our was soon brought into action. They were was awakened by a dog which came run- had slept well, but had thought my quarters hearts to take possession of the horses, when some one came rapidly out of the house. He On the morning of May 3 I passed on from | was uniformed in blue, and we found with grateful feelings that we had been trying to bridge watching troops who were crossing capture an advance detachment of the the North Fork. I suppose I looked badly, signal corps of General Sherman's command. as father asked me if I felt ill. I explained | Pony seemed greatly chagrined at being to him that the horse I had used the day placed in the ridiculous position in which before had been a poor one and had fallen | we now appeared, but I was satisfied and down and injured my leg badly, so that I happy to find myself with friends instead of felt very stiff and tired. He replied kindly being in the hands of the enemy. We did that I must use the one he had ridden, the best we could under the existing circumstances, and joined our friends of the torch and flag at dinner.

When dinner was over the firing had ceased in the direction of Raymond, and we taking the one father proposed for me to started upon our return to our headquarters; have, and all started for Hankinson's Ferry. but when we got back to the main road we found pickets stationed there, and we had staff went ahead of the troops, and we soon | some difficulty in convincing them that we were friends wishing to return to the Union that the enemy had placed there some artil- lines. We passed that night at an old farmhouse, and the following day rode into Ray-divisions of McPherson's Corps, commanded | Gen. Grant accompanying them. I, thinking by Gens. John A. Logan and M. M. Crocker, of the night veering my feet in the direction | body of the enemy marching up the road | two soldiers as gallant as ever drew sword. | town, going directly to the State-house. Shortly after the battle the troops which of the dog, in place of my head, and he from Grand Gulf and passing on toward Logan, being senior, commanded during the When I arrived at the Capitol the Confederfight. To see Logan on the field was worth A GREAT DEAL OF ONE'S LIFE.

He was called by his troops "Fighting I were a blue uniform. I was very small, regiments were put in order for battle and Jack," and they were thoroughly devoted to very wet, much splashed with mud, and almoved forward, the enemy soon giving way him. Crocker, who was also very brave. together unattractive. I was before them, and we resumed our journey to was not as handsome as Logan, but his troops swore by him. No division stood better After this skirmish, in which we lost one | than his in battle, nor was there one better man killed and several wounded, our escort in assault than his (Crocker's). When we from which they had come and discovered in moving down the road picked up many arrived upon the ground over which the batmuskets and about 30 prisoners. All these | tle of Raymond had been fought, we saw how short distance, and then place it with others had been captured the previous day with we took into Grand Gulf with us. When desperate the contest had been; at least and, stopping at the Capitol, dismounted and mpon the ground. They had arranged two some artillery. Mr. C. A. Dana, who was we arrived Admiral Porter had reached along that part of the road upon which we entered. I was filled with great enthusiasm, lines of dead bodies, one of Union soldiers then Assistant Secretary of War, and accom- there, and Gen. Grant went immediately on approached, for the wreck of battle had not followed him to the second floor of the building and passed through an open door. It and the other was given over to me. Mr. him. I remember well the cordial manner All the fearful sights were in plain view proved to be the Governor's room which I

Dana was well equipped, having a bridle of the Admiral when he invited us to stay except the wounded, who had been carried entered. A consultation must just have taken by sympathizing comrades to the town. place there, for the table was covered with Whether or not the number of Surgeons was papers and several pipes were lying about, sufficient I cannot say, but when we came the smoke still issuing from one of them. I to a house that was occupied by the Con- took what I supposed to be the Governor's Graphic and Spirited Defense of the federates as a hospital my father sent them | pipe, as it was the handsomest one and lying Dr. Hewitt, of his staff, to attend to their upon one end of the table. I believe that wants, and gave directions for medical sup- the Governor and his friends had left in plies to be left for them. I remember that great haste, when they saw their defenders several times, later on during the siege of retreating, Vicksburg, my father sent food and medical stores back to Raymond, and at one time he sent again Dr. Hewitt to care for the sick and that officer must have been taken prisoner, for he did not return to headquarters again during the siege.

FATHER AND SON.

We spent a night at Raymond, and next morning, in a driving storm, we started for Jackson, the Capital of Mississippi. This city is about 17 miles from Raymond. After proceeding about 15 miles, we were passing through a dense woods when a shot was fired. Some one of the staff shouted:

"General, the sharpshooters are aiming

All of us stopped and turned about, EXCEPT MY FATHER, to get under cover. Gen. Grant directed his horse to the side of the road and dashed into the woods directly toward the place whence the bullets were coming. He was quickly followed by Cols. Wilson and Lagow, and they by half a dozen Orderlies. Soon the whole of the escort went in, forming a skirmish-line and moving straight forward until we arrived at a large house, where we

Shortly after this Gen. Sherman's Corps came up, when some regiments were thrown out as skirmishers and moved forward some distance. Sherman himself soon arrived and began to place his men in line of battle; when they were all up and in position they were moved forward. We then followed this line, with slight skirmishing, until we reached a hill with an open field before it.

Away off to our left we could see McPherson and the enemy forming in lines of battle. Soon they were engaged in close contest. Sherman had now advanced against the line of fortifications about the city, halting for a short time when close up before them to take position for the assault. In the meantime we could hear the guns booming away on our left. Gen. Tuttle, of Gen. Sherman's Corps, was sent to our right. During the time that Gen. Sherman's men were being posted he himself was with Gen. Grant on the porch of an old house near by.

Suddenly all the guns in our front opened upon us, and our line was broken, the men making for the rear. Both Gens. Grant and Sherman immediately mounted their horses

AMONG THE RETREATING SOLDIERS. soon stopped them and made them return to their lines and prepare for battle.

My father, giving some directions to Gen. Sherman, rode off to that part of the field where Tuttle was engaged. I followed, and we soon came to where Tuttle's Division was forming in line in the midst of a very dense forest. This division was moved forward, and coming to the edge of the woods they found there the enemy's breastworks confronting them. The whole division

PREPARING FOR BURIAL. out meeting great resistance. The gallant men were then wheeled to the left and started The battle of Raymond was fought by two | up the line of the enemy's intrenchments. the battle was ended, rode off toward the ate troops were passing. They were in haste and paid no heed to my presence, although

> THE ONLY "YANKEE" AROUND. Soon after the retreating Confederates had passed I looked up the street in the direction some one on horseback carrying the Union flag approaching. This man rode past me

When I had looked about until quite satisfied, I returned to the street, and looking up I saw the officer whom I had accompanied into the building up high in the dome or cupola of the Capitol raising the Union flag over this fallen city. As there have been several people who have each claimed to ITS DEAD AND WOUNDED have been the one who raised our flag over the Capital of Mississippi, I may describe the officer's appearance as I saw him perform Proportionately More Than this famous act. He was a rather stout man, about five feet seven or eight inches in hight, with very dark complexion, black hair, eyes and beard. He wore his beard long and full. From his uniform I supposed him to be a Captain, although he may have been a First Lieutenant. He must have anticipated some opposition to his enterprise, for when I rode up to meet him,

HE AVOIDED ME, past to gain the door of the Capitol.

After leaving the State-house I remounted my pony and rode some distance toward heartily sick of the squabbles, the quarreling, the west, where I saw some horsemen ad- the unmilitary and unfraternal spirit manivancing. They proved to be Gen. Grant fested by so many writers in the "Fighting with his staff and escort. I returned with Them Over" department of the paper. If them to the city, where we went to a hotel | this part of THE NATIONAL TRIBUNE is to called the Bowen House; my father hav- be of any use to us, there must be a very ing the rooms given him that had been occu- different spirit shown by many of its conpied by the Confederate General Joseph E. Johnston the previous night.

down to the balcony of the hotel. There were assembled a few people, and the street in front of the building was crowded with

A STYLISH OUTFIT. negroes and some white persons. Presently an officer attired in Confederate uniform, with a flushed face, pushed his way upon the porch, and approaching my father, said something disagreeable, or intended to be so. My father told him to leave instantly, but as the officer refused to do so, Gen. Grant went to the railing of the porch, and calling up to him Serg't Spades, of his escort, ordered him to arrest this officer. The man obstinately

REFUSED TO MOVE. when Serg't Spades drew his saber, and said :

"Now go, or I will run you through." The officer retired thus under arrest, or guard. I never forgot this Confederate's face, so excited was I over the incident, and when I saw him nine years after, in the Khedive's (Ismail Pasha's) service in Egypt, I recognized him instantly. The circumstances just related were recalled, and we talked over the affair; and he took occasion to say to me that he had ever felt grateful to my father for the leniency shown him, when the punishment might have been so much more severe.

To be continued. THE BATTLE-FLAG. BY WILLIAM CASWELL JONES.

Battle-flag, glittering in sunlight and gold. On each starry crest of thy swelling fold The name of an hundred battles told. Recall the glories, O! comrade, when It way'd on the field o'er a thousand men While we marched to the field of battle; then This flag of ours was new, With its silvery stars, on a field of blue, And bright broad stripes commingling, too.

Omen of victory! to us unfold Scenes of thy carnage as yet untold-Deeds of thy warfare brave and bold. Read and rehearse with blinding tears The valor and courage of volunteers-Gather the trophies for coming years-Who gave their lives in the cause of right And march'd to the front in gallant fight. Led by our Flag of red, blue and white, Hail! noble Flag with thy battle scars! Glorious blending of immortal stars! Grand old souvenir of our wars! Of hast thou gladden'd the soldier's life On struggling fields when battles rife, Rainbowing the clouds of deadly strife. And now that the storm of war has fled, Bespangl'd banner of blue, white and red, May thy mem'ry ever bright luster shed.

That Rebel Spy's Song. EDITOR NATIONAL TRIBUNE: I saw some ime ago an inquiry about the song sung by a man in our camp at Murfreesboro, Tenn., in the Spring of 1863. He sang this song and others | to know that there was other fighting there to the boys, and sold us stamps. He was afterward shot while trying to get through our lines to the enemy. I remember a part of the song entitled "We Will Not Retreat Any More." For the benefit of the comrade asking for it, and wishing to get some of the boys to send me the fourth verse, I will give what I remember of it:

The fortunes of war often change, boys, And trifles do oft turn the scale, The' heavy the blow that we strike, boys, We find that the truest may fail,

We will not retreat any more, boys, We will not retreat any more, We've numbers to match the rebels we'll catch-We will not retreat any more.

Chorus.

We often go home in our dreams, boys, And sit by the old kitchen fire, And tell o'er the tale of our camps, boys, To listeners we never can tire.

But just in the moments of bliss, boys, When thinking our hardships are o'er.
The order comes round to turn out, boys-Fall in and march on as before. L. F. GOULD, Co. I, 73d Ill., Hastings, Neb.

Nineteenth Corps.

HOW IT FOUGHT

Bravely and Well at Winchester and Cedar Creek.

Those of the Sixth Corps.

BY CAPT. JAMES F. FITTS, 114TH N. Y., LOCK-PORT, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL TRIBUNE numbers its readers by hundreds of thousands. It is in the largest sense the organ of the veteran Union soldiers, because more of them are paid no heed to my salutations, and darted heard through its columns than through those of any other paper. I am one of its subscribers and constant readers who are tributors. I should be pleased to think that the class I refer to were as bloodthirsty After a refreshing bath my father went during the war as they seem to be inkthirsty now.

The error of these comrades is twofold, and always the same. First, they attempt to describe a battle that was fought over perhaps five square miles of territory, describing everything that occurred on every part of the field, when the ordinary case was that they were only permitted to see and participate in the fighting in a corner of it: and, second, they are full of that sweet innocence, big-headedness-call it what you will-that calmly ignores the presence of any other Union troops upon the field than their own regiment, brigade, division or corps. It is the old story of the fly on the cart-wheel over again:

"WHAT A DUST WE DO KICK UP!" Now this would be bad enough if the offenders went no further. But when posttive misrepresentation, not to say libel, and gross detraction of other organizations are added, for the purpose of exalting the writer's own, the offense becomes simply unbearable. and the veteran who will deliberately commit it deserves a severe pen-castigation. If ignorance is at the bottom of such conduct. so much the worse. The ignorant veteran had better keep out of print.

So much for the general subject. My object at this time is to call attention to the latest, and probably the worst, sinner in these respects. I refer to D. A. Lockhart, Captain, Co. A, 61st Pa., Smicksburg, Pa., who, in THE NATIONAL TRIBUNE of Dec. 30, 1886, exalts the Sixth Corps in connection with the oft reiterated, continually answered, and absolutely untruthful stock libels upon the Nineteenth Corps.

This old ground has been so often plowed over, the truth has been so often told by men who were contented to speak of what they saw and knew, that it seems a weary and profitless labor to thrash out all this straw again.

But the survivors of the Nineteenth are ust as proud of their good name and record as those of any other corps, and just as sensitive to injustice and misrepresentation. especially when the damaging untruths have been reiterated and dinned into the ear of the public for 22 years. And if under these circumstances we exhibit a little temper in replying to these "chestnuts," the situation ought to carry its own excuse.

I highly approve of Capt. Lockhart exalting the Sixth Corps. It was a gallant and serviceable organization, and surely he ought to be able to write a brief eulogy of it without crowding that article with slanders of another corps. Let me suggest to him and to others who have his unfortunate disposition, that there were numerous important things happening during that whole cam-

WHICH THEY DID NOT SEE. which they can only safely speak of by hearsay. Let them, then, go to authentic sources for their information. What Tom, Dick or Harry told Capt. Lockhart about the conduct of the Eighth or Nineteenth Corps is of no account. If he wants the truth, let him, I kindly suggest, get "The Shenandoah Valley in 1864," by George E. Pond (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; price $1), and he will find it, as well as learning much about that campaign that will surprise him. I will briefly, and temperately if I can, answer the aspersions which Capt. Lockhart has put into five inches of print.

The arrival of the Sixth Corps at Washington in July, 1864, was, he says, "just in time to drive Early from Fort Stevens and save the Capital." Did the writer happen besides that in front of Fort Stevens? Did he ever hear that 800 men of the Nineteenth Corps held a line at Fort Saratoga and did at least a modest share of the work? That was the truth. Capt. Lockhart says:

The line of the Nineteenth Corps had been broken and the enemy penetrated to our rear.

This was at Winchester, Sept. 19. Will Capt. Lockhart kindly inform us just how much he saw of the Nineteenth Corps in that battle? If he fought with the Sixth Corps on that terrifle day he was on the left, and as the Nineteenth was from first to last in and in front of the woods, entirely out of his sight, I infer that he is here simply retailing the old slander. Let me give him . few facts that I saw and know.

The Second Division of the Nineteenth Corps went in through the woods and scross